A very extensive photographic record of the 1980's Tardis Console and Time Rotor as introduced in the Peter Davison era.

A while back I sold a set of totally authentic and never before published construction blueprints of the Tardis Console. These were given to me by the prop's designer Mike Kelt.

Mike also allowed me full access to the prop at the BBC Visual Effects workshop in Kendal Avenue.

I have only just uncovered these shots whilst going through some old files.

There are dozens of original n-print size photos of the Console never before published showing virtually every detail in full colour.

All of the six control panels are shown and the exact array and colour of buttons and switches is apparent. The plinth is featured with and without its covers and the time rotor plus its internal mechanism and wiring is highlighted. The underside of at least one control panel is also shown revealing its construction and wiring.

Additionally there are three well draughted line drawings on tracing paper showing among other things the TV Monitor screens which were added later. These show the exact size of the monitors and how they sit in relation to the recesses in the Console.

The shots are all presented in a plastic window page style folder for easy reference which is approximately A4 with 3 shots per page. The photos are all loose and can be removed easily.

As with the Tardis blueprints, this is a genuine offer. I have taken no copies of these shots, the buyer will obtain the only set of originals that I possess.

Note that the images here show a pinkish cast to the A4 backing paper which on the actual photos is pure white. The colours in the photos on offer are entirely true to the actual colours of the Tardis Console.
